

To: FTC
Re: Proposed Business Opportunity Rule, R511993
Date: July 17, 2006
From: Chris Maxfield

To Whom It May Concern:

I wish to comment on a few of the points in your proposed ruling. I am a single parent with one daughter in college, another coming up in 2 years. I simply do not make enough money at my current job as an accountant to handle by monthly bills and save for my retirement. My Xango business is something I am counting on to fill in the holes, economically speaking. I have been doing this business for not quite one year yet and have covered my product costs – a product I wish to be on for my health – and am making a small amount of money on top of that. This will become larger as I work my business.

The proposed 7 day wait would give people the idea that ‘something is not quite right’ and would dampen any desire to get going right now; in point of fact, the product can be returned if one wants it to be returned.

My business cost me $35 to join – very nominal indeed. Nothing that would break the bank of an average lower to middle class household to do.

Secondly, knowing all the distributors in a various geographic radius is just not doable. When one joins Xango for $35 you might be a product user only and tell a friend or two; or you might be ‘on it’, really working the business; how would I or even Xango Corporate know the difference?

Xango has provided me a product that I use everyday and a group of people I find uplifting and terrific. I am blessed twice by just being a part of this fine organization.

Regards,

Chris Maxfield